Fleet One-third That of Normal Times and Old Vessels Are Crowded.

Twenty-four passenger steamships are shown on the chart to-day-sixteen bound for Europe and eight for this port-all thronged with passengers. This is about a third of the number in the steamship lanes in the corresponding period in normal times; that is, before the beginning of the great war. Because of the ilmited fleet, still further reduced by the absence of the Holland-America passenger carriers tied up at Rotterdam by the persistent marine workers' strike less than half the pleasure seeking multitude that would like to go abroad will be able to fulfil their desire

The steamships bound westward have part of their steerage accommodations filled with passengers unable to get quarters in cabins, and some of the eastbound ships carry as members of the crew passengers who could not otherwise reach the other side. The steam-
